Podcasts, posts, and pieces that shaped the thinking here

Where this movement shows up in the world.

Every so often someone asks where they can actually see or hear this work happening, beyond a deck or a webpage. This is that answer — a running, hand-picked shelf of podcasts, social posts from people on the ground, and writing that's shaped how we think about food as infrastructure. No live embeds, no algorithm feeding it — just links worth your time, added by hand.

Format Simple cards, no third-party embeds

Upkeep Added by hand as things come in, not automated

Why this exists

A shelf, not a feed

In plain terms

Nothing on this page updates itself. Someone adds a link because it's worth fifteen minutes of your time — a podcast, a post from a dinner or a workshop, a piece of writing that changed how we think about this. That's the whole idea.

Podcasts

Worth your commute

Episodes and series that dig into food systems, resilience, and the economics underneath them — added as they're found, not as a comprehensive archive.

Social & on the ground

The edges of the movement, in their own words

Dinners, workshops, growers and grocers already testing pieces of this system — shared as simple links, not embedded widgets, so the page stays fast and looks like the rest of the site.

Writing that shaped how we think about this

Not the primary evidence base — that lives on the homepage's Further Reading — but the pieces that shifted how we frame the problem, or made the case better than we could.

Report

Nourishing Britain

Dr Dolly van Tulleken, on why UK food policy struggles to stick.

Media & Inspiration

A running, hand-curated shelf of podcasts, social posts and writing connected to the Food as Infrastructure portfolio — built to make it easy to point someone toward the human side of this work, not just the plans.
